A face with a criminal past, but bright future.

September 2007.

Let it loose in a shop or tech firm.

Unless you were branding a new prison, it is unlikely a name search would turn up this gem of a free font.

It is called Criminal Narrow and belongs in the class of unique sans. It has elements of futurism with its tall letterforms, and a whimsy of retro with tight curved corners, and bows to the digital age with squarish punchouts on some horizontal joints, and joists.

Though quite steelish in its outline shape, it is also very readable, even at a distance. So it would suit a project revamping a shop identity, with window display posters, and product tags.

With a hint of the digital age in its pixel hollows, it would also suit a corporate identity program for a software firm, or an information technology consultancy needing a make over.

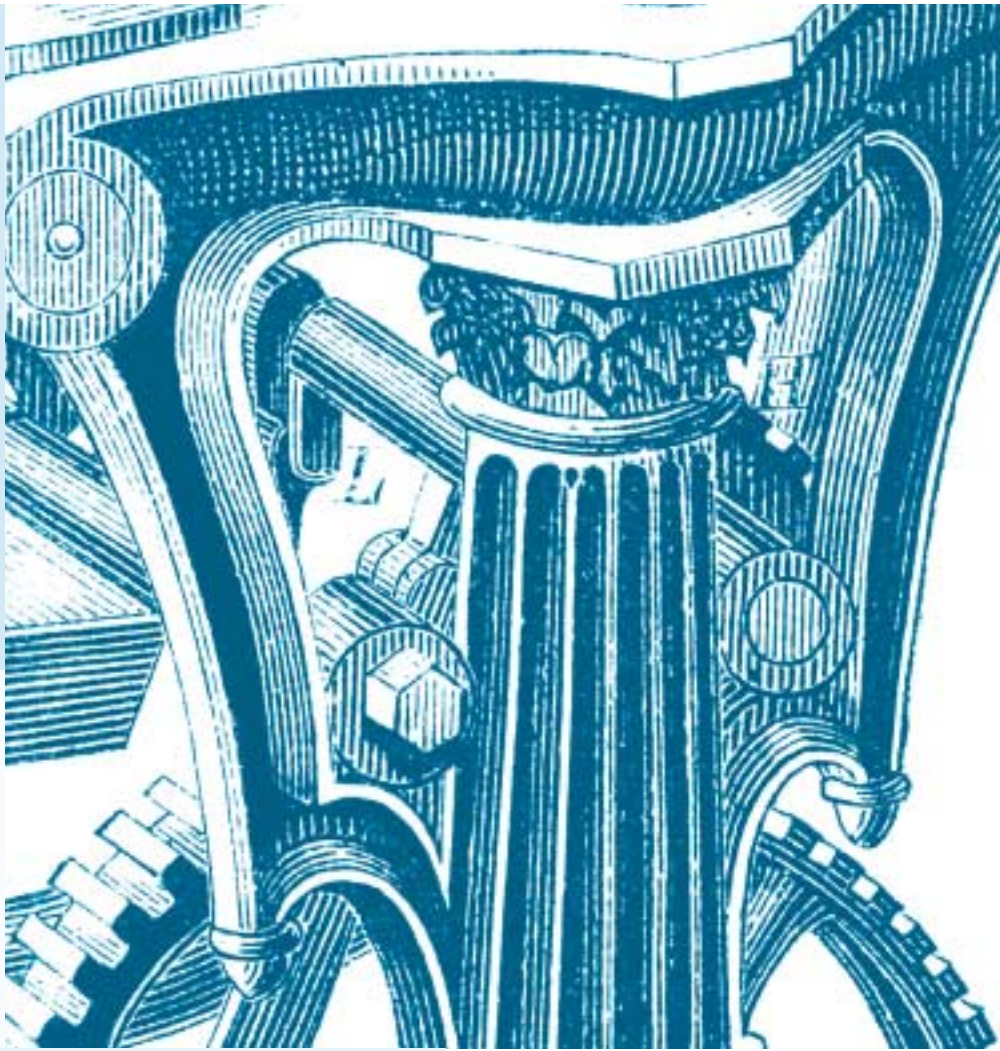

Upgrade your atomic fallout shelter to KD3, before the inspection.
